TRAINING OBJECTIVES

The objectives of the doctoral course in Historic and Textual Sciences, according to Dublin descriptors for the third cycle, concur to achieve a set of skills and competencies necessary for the final degree:

- full understanding of the disciplinary field of research, as represented by the relevant curriculum, and skills in the research and analytical methods associated with it;
- ability to design, implement and adapt a research process taking into account ethical issues related to knowledge production;
- design and implement original research that can expand the frontiers of knowledge;
- develop skills in critical analysis, evaluation and synthesis of new and complex ideas;
- achieve a level of dissemination and communication appropriate to their field of research;
- engage in activities to promote, in academic and professional contexts, their results through participation in conferences and scientific publications;
- write a research thesis and support it with the prospect of discussing it before a committee at the conclusion of the three years.

The objectives are aimed, first and foremost, at offering students a training project consistent with the outgoing professional profiles (guaranteed by the different curricula) and the knowledge and skills (both disciplinary and interdisciplinary) associated with them. The training project consists of a series of enabling elements, among which we highlight:

- the financial and structural resources available and the specificities offered by the University, including links with the territory in which it is embedded, i.e., relations with research institutions, the business world, various cultural and social organizations, sensitive to the themes of the doctoral course, open and available to different forms of collaboration;
- the network of relationships, both national and international, developed by the University and the members of the Teaching Board, which allow a constant alignment with the cultural and scientific evolution of the disciplines of reference of the Doctorate and a sustainable, effective and consistent mobility with the research developed, and offer prospects for cooperation at various levels for doctoral students, who will benefit from economic support consistent with current regulations;
- the centrality of the doctoral students, whose growth as an integral part of the scientific community is promoted and fostered, both through the organization of aggregating and common activities between the various curricula, and through disciplinary activities characterizing the curriculum of reference, including participation, also as speakers, in congresses, workshops and/or training schools both national and international;
- the strong interdisciplinary character of the doctoral course, based on a previous and consolidated interaction among the various members of the College pertaining to the different curricula, involved in common research projects and teaching activities, which guarantee different possibilities of collaboration to the advantage of a multifaceted training not limited to one's own disciplinary field.

CURRICULA AND RESEARCH AREAS

- ITALIAN STUDIES
The curriculum aims at developing specialistic formations in a wide historical and methodological spectrum, in a variety of disciplines, comprising romance philology to the history and hermeneutics of medieval, modern, and contemporary literature; philology of Italian Literature and linguistics and History of Italian language; the relationship between publishing and literature; literary theory and comparative literature. The curriculum aims at forming researchers who are at ease with both linguistic and philological notions and theoretical ones. They will be able to create critical and annotated editions of texts belonging to the romance or Italian tradition, as well as to innovative analyses in the fields of literary history, educative linguistics, didactics of language and literature, cultural and thematic studies.

- FOREIGN LANGUAGES AND LITERATURES

The curriculum revolves around the study of foreign languages and literatures (English, French, Spanish, German, Russian, Portuguese, Chinese) as well as on their postcolonial expressions. The constant search for original and innovative trajectories favors the connection with most recent theories and methodologies of linguistic disciplines (translation, discourse analysis, corpora studies, lexicography), as well as the theoretical and historical critical analysis of different literary and cultural expression, from Early Modern to the Contemporary Age.

- CLASSICAL STUDIES

The curriculum aims at expanding, in the enrolled students, knowledge and competences about classical studies, and especially in the fields of linguistics, classical philology and literature, archaeology, Medieval and Humanistic tradition of Greek and Latin language and culture. Students will be brought to create a critical edition, a commentary, or an essay, concerning texts written in Greek or Latin, or the edition of archaeological sources or contexts, considering the entire timeframe of their tradition, or prolonged life.

- HISTORICAL SCIENCES

The curriculum aims at forming young scholars in the critical analysis of the past, from Antiquity to Contemporary age, with a specific focus on socio-economic, institutional-judicial, political-religious, and cultural dimensions of human communities. The curriculum will also involve the history of historiography, intellectual history, the history of political thought, historical geography, and economic history. In this light, the curriculum will promote research paths based on most recent theoretical-disciplinary methods, that will allow students to confront themselves with sources, as well as reconstructing the contexts, as well as classic interpretations and traditions, fostering an original research project, as well as the capacity to look at and reproduce the complexity of the past. In terms of formation, students will acquire solid critical methodologies, among which the capacity to establish a dialogue with archival disciplines, social sciences, and Digital Humanities.
